

Egley Complex

Photo Gallery

A wide variety of equipment is used in wildland firefighting. Below are a couple of the types of equipment used on the Egley Incident.

Click on a Photograph Below to Access a Larger Version

A skidgen is a skidder that has been converted to an engine. They have the water handling capabilities of an engine and they are designed to cover terrain that some engines cannot reach. Skidgen's also have blades for building fireline. These are rubber tired skidgens, some are on tracks.

Dozers are tracked vehicles with front mounted blades, used for building fireline. The individual responsible for supervising the operations of a dozer is known as the Dozer Boss.

A skidgen is a skidder that has been converted to an engine. They have the water handling capabilities of an engine and they are designed to cover terrain that some engines cannot reach. Skidgen's also have blades for building fireline. These are rubber tired skidgens, some are on tracks.

A skidgen is a skidder that has been converted to an engine. They have the water handling capabilities of an engine and they are designed to cover terrain that some engines cannot reach. Skidgen's also have blades for building fireline. These are rubber tired skidgens, some are on tracks.

The individual responsible for supervising the operations of a dozer is known as the Dozer Boss.

Dozers are tracked vehicles with front mounted blades, used for building fireline.